

For my 3 VR games, I had issues getting the suggested ones to work with my HTC Vive. They were either not compatible because of where they come from, or cost money on steam, so I used 3 games that I already owned that were similar.

Gran Turismo Sport

This game is for the Playstation 4 VR. I had a lot of fun with this. First of all, it is my first VR experience outside of the Vive, so it was interesting to see how other companies set up their hardware for VR. I gotta say, Sony has a very simple and easy to set up system for the PS4, but that lightweight intuitiveness comes at the cost of performance. The graphics inside the headset itself were pretty bad. Everything was pixelated and frames dropped every now and then. But the game itself played very well. It was basically just playing a racing game but with the added benefit of moving your head and also having a bit more depth perception, which sounds miniscule, but actually makes a world of difference in racing games.

VR Chat

A classic, I can always rely on this game to bring me closer to my friends who live across town or across the country. For the most part, the game performs smoothly. Most maps and player avatars are fairly simple so they load and render easily. But when it comes to finding maps and models that are not optimized or have lots of detail, my computer chugs and sometimes outright crashes the game. VRC has gone through many changes over the years that have led to controversial opinions, but they haven't really detracted my own personal experience. Overall I love the game and it's fun to explore new maps that are being made every day.

Hotdogs, Horseshoes, and Handgrenades

This is one of the first VR games I ever played so it holds a special place in my heart. The gameplay is super fun and the developers are always adding more content to keep things fresh. The controls make perfect sense and are super intuitive, but can be kinda clunky at times due to the controllers losing tracking occasionally. For the most part, the game is very stable. Rarely will I ever experience frame drop or major glitches. I've also never had it crash on me. If you have not played it, I would highly recommend doing so!
